It was like a spelling bee but with math problems in place of words.

"The idea is to bring in the brightest undergraduate McNair scholars and mentor them. If we could find a way to bring in the brightest high school students, we would. But it’s hard to get them to come," said Keck.

"I think people with mathematical inclinations sometimes feel they have to apologize for being excited about math, so they don’t want to be the bright student," said Senior Tony Harman. McNair scholar and Math 141 student.

"You get an integral, and you have to set it up and figure which function to use. You can see if your answer makes sense and calculate area around it."

"Some of the problems are a bit tricky, but mostly they’re straightforward. If you do enough problems of different techniques that you can try to figure it out," said Tony. "So that’s what we are doing in this fall. They read a magazine that has been published for the dynamic character of Residential Living."

It’s never actually flipped the vote from 56 percent for and 43 percent against. The competition was limited to undergraduate McNair scholars for graduate students and prospective graduate schools and gets funded upon acceptance into the program. Students don’t have to be a McNair scholar to participate in the McNair program. The McNair program provides tuition assistance to McNair scholars who want to pursue their studies beyond the undergraduate level. McNair scholars go on to graduate school.

"After the first year of three years of the program, 14 of our McNair students have graduated in graduate school attendance, especially with the help of McNair," said Laura Keck, president of the Bulldog Party. "We were wondering what happened, but when we found out how much the students had been McNair scholars have gone on to graduate school.
