Dixon takes the plunge

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Dixon takes the plunge

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Carried away

Missouri residents can now carry a concealed weapon without a permit under a new law passed by the Missouri legislature.

The law, House Bill 349, was signed into law by Governor Mike Parson last week. It allows Missouri residents who are at least 23 years old, pass an 8-hour firearms safety course and have that right, senior Bailey Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit," she said. "And people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.

Several Truman students said they are afraid of what might happen if concealed weapons are increased in numbers, especially with children, senior Mike Lovenguth said.

"Students said it wouldn’t make them feel safer if they were allowed to carry a gun," Sherry said.

"People are already concealing weapons without a permit, and as people who just want that protection should have the right," Sherry added.