behind the counter, and customers must ask for it before purchasing. The Sudafed is kept on the counter Wednesday afternoon. The Sudafed is kept on the counter unless more efforts are made.

The law has led to an almost 21 percent decrease in the number of cases of methamphetamine lab detections, which is possibly influenced by the fact that people believe they have fewer opportunities to use or produce drugs, according to the Missouri Highway Patrol. With that, more people believe, however, that more needs to be done, especially on a state and federal level. The only thing about methamphetamine that helps us fight it, is the fact that you have to have more pseudoephedrine to make it. So that's a challenge for the meth producers.

The police do not check the logs in the system. We cannot stop analyzing whether there's any gaps in the system altogether, Talent said. We can't stop fighting against meth. The Meth Coalition has not stopped. We can't stop stopping. We can't stop looking at potential legislation, we can't stop analyzing whether there's any gaps in the system. We have won the war against methamphetamine.

The state law works. The state law works. Ald. Chris Waller, R-Mo., one of the sponsors of the law, said the law has been crucial in the fight against meth.

"The only thing about methamphetamine that helps us fight it, is the fact that you have to have more pseudoephedrine to make it. So that's a challenge for the meth producers."

"We're here to follow the law," Allen said. "We're trying to accomplish what the law is trying to accomplish."

"The law has been a great step in the right direction."
