Dear Editor,

I am writing to express my concern about the recent decision to eliminate the university's standardized-test requirement. This action seems to be driven more by a desire to increase enrollment at the expense of academic standards.

As many of us know, standardized tests like the ACT and SAT are meant to assess a student's readiness for college. They are not designed to evaluate a student's potential for academic success. The elimination of this requirement means that students who may not have performed well on these tests will have a better chance of being admitted. This is not the best way to ensure that our students are prepared for success in college.

Moreover, the removal of the standardized-test requirement will likely lead to a less diverse student body. As you mentioned, the university has already observed an increase in enrollment by a more diverse student population. If this trend continues, the university will become a better place because the diverse student body is necessary to creating a vibrant, inclusive, and engaging campus environment.

In conclusion, I urge the university administration to reconsider this decision. I believe that the university should maintain its standardized-test requirement to ensure that students are adequately prepared for college and to maintain a diverse and representative student body.

Sincerely,
