Home venues upset athletes

Arthur Schutter's 15-year tenure as Truman Athletic Director is being commemorated by a special article that highlights the challenges he faced during his leadership. Schutter's focus on improving athletic facilities, however, has been met with mixed results due to limited funding. The department, which is ranked 14th in the nation, has made strides in developing plans for the renovation of athletic facilities, but much of the funding for improvements remains uncertain. Schutter said he hopes to improve the facilities, but the lack of funding has been a challenge.

Poor facilities and lack of funding affect athletes

The University of Missouri is doing a lot of things well when it comes to athletic facilities. The athletic facilities director, Jerry Wolfering, said he helps determine the athletic budget, which includes money for facility improvements and new equipment. He gets advice from coaches on various sports, and the athletic department is always looking for ways to improve. I know the University is getting ready to embark on its first capital campaign, said Wolfering. We're going to need a lot of money to improve our facilities, and the athletic department is always looking for ways to improve.

“Today when recruits come to the campus, our most important tool is the athletic facilities,” Schutter said. “We've made a lot of improvements, and we're excited about what we've done. But we still have a long way to go.”
