CUTS
President plans to eliminate CJC to save money
Contended from Page 1

“Due to the financial limitations and the level of economic difficulty, the College has no other choice,” he said.

In the past six months, the College has reduced its workforce by 25 percent, or 38 employees. The cuts were made to balance the College’s budget, which is projected to be $1.3 million in the red in the fiscal year ending June 30.

The cuts include the elimination of 12 positions: three in administration, six in faculty and three in staff.

President Robert Gooding-Williams announced plans at a press conference Wednesday to recoup $4 to $5 million in savings.

President Gooding-Williams said the cuts will be made in the next two months, starting with the fiscal year that begins July 1.

The closures include the elimination of the College of Liberal Arts and Science, the Schools of Education and Business, and the College of Health, Physical Education and Human Performance.

The announcement comes after a year of budget cuts and layoffs at the College, which has been struggling to keep up with rising costs and declining enrollment.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.

The cuts are expected to save the College about $1.3 million, according to Gooding-Williams.

The cuts will affect about 200 employees, or about 10 percent of the College’s workforce.

The cuts will also affect about 1,000 students, who will be affected by the elimination of programs and courses.

The College has been struggling to keep up with the cost of tuition and fees, which have increased by 42 percent over the past five years.

The College has also been grappling with declining enrollment, which has dropped by 20 percent over the past five years.

The College has been trying to find ways to cut costs and improve its financial stability.

The College’s financial situation has been exacerbated by the ongoing economic recession, which has hit many of the College’s key industries, including manufacturing, construction and real estate.

Despite the cuts, Gooding-Williams said the College is committed to providing a quality education for its students.

“I believe in the mission of the College, and I believe in the students who come here,” he said. “We will do everything we can to ensure that they have the best possible experience.”

The cuts will take effect in July, and Gooding-Williams said the College will work with students and faculty to ensure a smooth transition.

The College has also announced plans to cut the budget for its summer program by 20 percent, and to reduce the number of staff positions by 10 percent.

The College has also been working to improve its financial stability by seeking new sources of revenue, including partnerships with businesses and organizations.