Local residents plan to remodel schoolhouse into child care center

Byrn said. “We have good centers where they can come together and choose, however.

She said she will be the owner and director of the center.

She said now that the Byrns have the chance to interact if they want to.

Byrn said the child care center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.

Historic school burns down, kindles memories

Kirksville lost a piece of its intergenerational day-care center.

With the help of her husband and the Kirksville Historical Society, Tara Byrn has decided to take the old 707 N. Centennial St. building and turn it into a new intergenerational center.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

Byrn said the center will be a place for older adults to go during the day to give their caretakers a break.

She said it would be nice if Truman students could come to the center for hands-on experience, although she knew it’s a little too late to do that.