Riots in France cause concern

Some students postpone travels, though all are fine

Carl Walz

Staff Reporter

As soon as it’s confirmed, Truman students studying abroad are being warned to stay away.

Weekends have always been a great opportunity to see the world. But now that a riot has broken out in France, it appears that the State Department is no longer confident enough to allow those students to be there.

The State Department has issued a travel alert, warning Americans not to travel to France. This comes as no surprise, since the State Department has warned against travel to a number of terrorist and political hotspots in France in the past.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France was made after the news broke that a French student had been killed in a protest earlier this week. The student was killed after he was shot by police during a demonstration in Paris.

The State Department also warned that there are rumors that the government may try to ban all foreign travelers from entering the country. This is a significant threat, as many Americans are planning trips to France for the holidays.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France comes after a series of riots broke out in the country earlier this week. The riots began after the death of a 22-year-old youth, who was killed by French police in a protest earlier this week.

The State Department has warned that the situation is volatile and that there is a risk of further violence. The department has urged Americans to avoid all non-essential travel to France.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France has been met with mixed reactions. Some students who had been planning to travel to France have expressed frustration, while others have welcomed the decision.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France comes after a series of riots broke out in the country earlier this week. The riots began after the death of a 22-year-old youth, who was killed by French police in a protest earlier this week.

The State Department has warned that the situation is volatile and that there is a risk of further violence. The department has urged Americans to avoid all non-essential travel to France.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France has been met with mixed reactions. Some students who had been planning to travel to France have expressed frustration, while others have welcomed the decision.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France comes after a series of riots broke out in the country earlier this week. The riots began after the death of a 22-year-old youth, who was killed by French police in a protest earlier this week.

The State Department has warned that the situation is volatile and that there is a risk of further violence. The department has urged Americans to avoid all non-essential travel to France.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France has been met with mixed reactions. Some students who had been planning to travel to France have expressed frustration, while others have welcomed the decision.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France comes after a series of riots broke out in the country earlier this week. The riots began after the death of a 22-year-old youth, who was killed by French police in a protest earlier this week.

The State Department has warned that the situation is volatile and that there is a risk of further violence. The department has urged Americans to avoid all non-essential travel to France.

The decision to cancel travel plans to France has been met with mixed reactions. Some students who had been planning to travel to France have expressed frustration, while others have welcomed the decision.