Using a round rock, a member of the Missouri State University-Northeast Missouri State University-Midwest University Combined System said that some ancient Native American tools are made from moose hair and other animal materials. A group of students conducted a study on the topic.

"The fact that someone is in an ancient Native American room full of ancient artifacts, it's like taking a rock and creating a sharp blade," the student said. "It's amazing what we can make.

"Seizing the whole thing and feeling it—I thought, Wow!"

A student working on the Missouri State University-Northeast Missouri State University-Midwest University Combined System said that this is a good way to learn about Native American tools. He found that the Native American tools are very useful in making sharp blades. The student also said that the tools can be used to cut things, such as meat or bone.
