ITS offers program for notes

Michelle Tatro

for the Tribune

Free trials are available to help students take better notes this semester, but not many students are taking advantage of them. Copies of the Microsoft Office OneNote program are provided to students at no cost through Information Technology Services. The program is designed to help students take digital notes on a desktop or laptop.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

I think a lot of people are always suspicious of anything that’s free, but it is.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

I don’t think anyone would have 365 days of notes, but if they did, they’d probably want something a little more organized than a desk calendar.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

Boxes of OneNote 2003 software are stored outside of the ITS room in McClain Hall.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

I think the student has to do a lot of the work because the program has to be installed on every computer.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

The university did not have to buy the program for the students, but it is.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

The university did want to pass out the program, but the program never arrived on time. After the university received the program, the university did not have to pay to include it in the program.

Chad M. Tatro

for the Tribune

I don’t think the students would be interested in this kind of program if the university didn’t have a student organization to distribute it.