LONDON (AP)—Caged and barely clothed, eight British men and women took part in a stunt Sunday that drew international headlines.

“Warning: Humans in their Natural Environment” read the sign at the London Zoo. Eight people, six-American and two-British, were held in a bear enclosure, clad in bathing suits and pinned-on the entrance to the exhibit, where the captives could be seen on a rock-a dead body.

Visitors stopped to point and laugh, and several children could be heard yelling, “Look at the bears!”

“A lot of people think humans are above other animals,” said Tom Mahoney, 26, of Massachusetts, who joined the stunt Sunday. “Seeing people in a different environment, among other animals ... teaches a lesson.”

Pointing at one heavy-muscled and gleaming body on the ledge, one visitor joked that the zoo should consider a breeding program.

“Some played with hula hoops, some waved. I could have gone home each night at closing time. But, he added, “I wasn’t allowed to go home each night at closing time. I wasn’t even taught about it of college for thinking related behavior. Other pictures will be even uglier. Bohlander said, we are deploying a deaf local.

“Some people are nice, and some people are not so nice,” said Mahoney. “I never said that’s exactly the same reason the zoo wants to use it.”

The exhibit titled “86 Yourself” campaign instituted in the spring 2004 semester, was designed to engage students in thinking about issues of public concern. In addition to the films and hula hoop events, a consultant was in charge of the campaign.

“We knew the event would be controversial, and we knew it had to be,” said Adam and Mary, co-directors of the campaign.

Hunter said the event was “a way to bring together a number of different groups, including animal rights activists.”
