Dreams, love clash and burn

At the teacher age of 17 I fell in love with the Kratt Brothers on the PBS series "Wild Kratts." For about a week I daydreamed about them and their adventures as they explored new animals and adapted to the wild. I would look forward to their episodes every week and would often imagine myself as one of the characters. I would even dream about them and their adventures. I would often wonder what it would be like to be a part of their world.

However, as I grew older, my interests shifted and I began to focus more on my career goals. I wanted to pursue a degree in biology and become a scientist. I would often think about the different animals I had seen on the show and how I could study them in the wild. I was always fascinated by the Kratts' passion for exploring and learning about the natural world.

I remember a time when I was watching an episode of "Wild Kratts" and one of the characters mentioned that they had seen a rare species of bird. I thought to myself, "I want to be a scientist like that!" I wanted to be able to discover new species and learn about the secrets of the natural world.

As I grew older, my interest in the Kratts began to fade. I realized that their goals were not aligned with mine. I wanted to pursue a career in science, while they pursued their own goal of entertaining children. I began to feel like I was being pulled in different directions.

I also realized that my love for the Kratts was not the same as my love for science. I realized that I was focusing too much on my personal interests and not paying enough attention to the needs of others. I began to feel like I was being selfish.

Looking back, it was one of the most important lessons I learned in life. I realized that I needed to prioritize my goals and focus on what was truly important to me. I learned that relationships require compromise and that it is important to remember to prioritize the needs of others.

The Kratts taught me that it is important to follow your dreams, but also to remember to prioritize the needs of others. I learned that it is possible to have different goals and still be happy. I learned that it is important to be true to yourself and to remember the lessons you have learned in life.

In conclusion, the Kratts taught me a lot about following my dreams and prioritizing my goals. I learned that it is possible to have different goals and still be happy. I learned that it is important to be true to yourself and to remember the lessons you have learned in life.
