Men's Resource Center would benefit all without harm to WRC

AROUND THE QUAD

What would you think of a Men's Resource Center?

“I think I'd be glad, especially since with WRC does so much.”

“I don't think I'd believe Truman wanted a resource center to cater to my needs.”

“Since we don't have one already, I don't know what services it'd offer.”

“I don't think I'd believe Truman wanted a resource center to cater to my needs.”

“I don't know if I'd believe Truman wanted a resource center to cater to my needs.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design-and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.

PHIL JARRETT

Phil Jarrett is a senior political science major from Nashville, Tenn.

“He’s a very funny speaker, and he did a good job.”

“I found it very interesting, and I enjoyed it.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design—and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.

PHIL JARRETT

Phil Jarrett is a senior political science major from Nashville, Tenn.

“He’s a very funny speaker, and he did a good job.”

“I found it very interesting, and I enjoyed it.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design—and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.

PHIL JARRETT

Phil Jarrett is a senior political science major from Nashville, Tenn.

“He’s a very funny speaker, and he did a good job.”

“I found it very interesting, and I enjoyed it.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design—and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.

PHIL JARRETT

Phil Jarrett is a senior political science major from Nashville, Tenn.

“He’s a very funny speaker, and he did a good job.”

“I found it very interesting, and I enjoyed it.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design—and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.

PHIL JARRETT

Phil Jarrett is a senior political science major from Nashville, Tenn.

“He’s a very funny speaker, and he did a good job.”

“I found it very interesting, and I enjoyed it.”

Of course, the ironic part is that a Men's Resource Center, which many mainstream men already believe they don’t need, will have to wait for its moment to design—and-existing Women's Resource Center (MRC) will have to wait until there is a men's version. This is an issue of role expectations, as it was established long before men and women were expected to be given equal status, as equality between the sexes is a concept still considered controversial — that is, only the most men will do so.

A move to create an MRC might be read as a move to change from expecting a college community to be primarily women-focused, benevolently to primarily women-focused, benevolently.

The focus, then, is primarily on women, as well. "The Women’s Resource Center (WRC) is considered feminine — a quality that most men find too weak. Therefore, a move to create a similar resource for men might be read as an attempt to make all our programming and services, though serving women's needs, more acceptable to men. If a WRC is expected to be successful, there are at least two factors that seem essential to its success: First, the center would have to be primarily women-focused, benevolently.

But I think it’s probably a step in the right direction. I think it’s important to keep in mind that the WRC has been in existence for quite some time, and it has been successful in helping many women.

And then — and then — Sigma Phi Epsilon. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this. I'm probably the only one here who knows how to laugh about this.