The Recycling Program has a problem: there are too many volunteers. At times, the campus is flooded with students and faculty carrying suitcases loaded with recyclables. This has led to a spike in recycling Center coordination and a consequent glut of volunteers. In order to address this issue, the Recycling Center will be moving to a more selective volunteer policy. This policy will ensure that the number of volunteers is more manageable and that the recycling process is more efficient.

A recent survey of the 3,000 residents of the university found that 67% of them engage in recycling activities. This high rate of participation has led to a significant increase in the amount of material being recycled. In fact, last semester, the amount of recycled material per residence hall room was 57 pounds, compared to just 30 pounds the previous semester.

Although we do not recycle as much as the Recycling Center’s records might suggest, there are still many opportunities for students to get involved. One of the best ways to do this is to work for the Recycling Center. This fall, the Recycling Center will be hiring a few volunteers to assist with their daily operations. If you are interested, please come to the Recycling Center and talk to the director about the available positions.

In conclusion, although the Recycling Program has a problem, there are also many opportunities for students to get involved. By volunteering at the Recycling Center, you will be helping to ensure that the campus remains green and sustainable. So keep an eye out for job openings and get involved in the Recycling Program today.
