Taking college courses in high school lets students get ahead

Similar public colleges also could use national databases from programs such as Project GRAD, which helps high school students prepare for college. States also could consider including high school students in college-level courses, which many public colleges also have added in recent years. Such courses can be particularly useful to students who plan to become educators or nurses.

But nationwide improvements in higher education might be most useful to students who are interested in the arts. The trend toward online college courses could help these students by providing them with new opportunities to broaden their education.

Andrew Kindiger

Corrections

A design page on page 9 of the August 17 issue of the Index should have been credited to Sarah Schmidt.

A paragraph on page 4 of the August 17 issue of the Index contained a corrected name. The player in the photograph is sophomore Andrew Thatcher.

Letters to the Editor

Congress should take lead in energy policy

During last fall’s elections, individuals voted overwhelmingly about renewable energy and climate change issues. From new state laws to local resolutions, senators and congressmen stand ready to hold our leaders accountable. That's right, this is the year the University should take the lead in college courses.

That’s why it’s time to act for the good of the University community. As a member of the University of Texas, your opinion counts. It’s time to act now.

Andrew Kindiger

Taking college courses in high school lets students get ahead

The trend toward online college courses could help students who are interested in the arts. The trend toward online college courses could help these students by providing them with new opportunities to broaden their education. The trend toward online college courses could help students who are interested in the arts. The trend toward online college courses could help these students by providing them with new opportunities to broaden their education.

Andrew Kindiger