Sumter said. However, about a month ago, public safety director Mike Gambaksi said some of the evidence was not entered into the system for 15-20 days, which could make a difference in the trial. "We have no way of knowing what the recollection of the witness will be, or the crime itself," Sumter said. "The jury will have to decide if the man was telling the truth, or if it was just a 22 percent." Sumter said.

Betsy Delmonico, professor of English and linguistics, said eReaders might be effective for returning students who already have knowledge of a particular field. They can download all of a textbook's material. Delmonico, high hopes for the program, considers the technology, according to an article in The Northeastern Press, "...a novel concept, but the reality is that the technology is not the key to success..." Delmonico added that the students did not have access to the technology or the ability to display images. Students who don't have an Internet connection would need to find an Internet connection. Students who do not have Internet access or the ability to display images may have trouble making use of the eReader.

"Some people need the feel of the page turning to understand the context," Delmonico said. "We are taking the risk of a tool that doesn't exist, and for something so expensive, it is not for everyone. Delmonico also said that although today's generation might not have trouble making use of the tool, tomorrow's generation might have trouble making use of..."
