Extra credits give undergraduates unfair advantage in registration

Tyler Retherford

The frantic, desperate struggle for class registration is something every student has felt. From the first day of registration every student must consider what courses to take for the fall, spring, and summer semesters. But the final result is often decided by the first come, first served registration system. Yet students feel entitled to "extra credits" in order to gain an advantage in the registration process. In my opinion, the registration process is rigged in favor of students who have extra credits. Although it is a regulated system, it is possible for people to have unfair advantages. The only explanation I could give is that the system allows students to have extra credits in order to gain an advantage in the registration process.

The registration process is based on a system that rewards students with extra credits. The system rewards students who have extra credits because they have extra credits. However, this system allows students to have unfair advantages. The only explanation I could give is that the system allows students to have extra credits in order to gain an advantage in the registration process. In my opinion, the registration process is rigged in favor of students who have extra credits. Although it is a regulated system, it is possible for people to have unfair advantages. The only explanation I could give is that the system allows students to have extra credits in order to gain an advantage in the registration process.

On the other hand, students with extra credits often get priority over students who do not have extra credits. This is because of the system. In my opinion, the registration process is rigged in favor of students who have extra credits. Although it is a regulated system, it is possible for people to have unfair advantages. The only explanation I could give is that the system allows students to have extra credits in order to gain an advantage in the registration process. In my opinion, the registration process is rigged in favor of students who have extra credits. Although it is a regulated system, it is possible for people to have unfair advantages. The only explanation I could give is that the system allows students to have extra credits in order to gain an advantage in the registration process.