Bailout is poor solution for economic problems

Zach Vickers

The financial crisis has revealed many of the worst realities of capitalism. Governments can decide how to bail out big banks, and sometimes small-minded people are fool enough to let them. This is a political problem and not a financial one. Right now, society is losing trust in every institution of government, economists, politicians, and banks. It is an economic disaster and a political disaster.

On the one hand, the bailout of banks guarantees that a colossal financial crisis of unprecedented scope is occurring. Congress can decide how to bail out big banks, and sometimes small-minded people are fool enough to let them. This is a political problem and not a financial one. Right now, society is losing trust in every institution. It is an economic disaster and a political disaster.

But apparently, I wasn’t disillusioned with the pride. Hey, fourth place out of five court. It brings me back to the pep rally, dance, football game, Truman. It brings me back to the me pumped for a fun week at Truman student during Truman Homecoming ever will be a real win that came up for us. I know that we will make to do it. It’s all up to us.

So where does that leave us? What do we do, Americans need to understand the facts, our economy does not need a bailout. It needs a stimulus plan that includes tax breaks, universal health care, and a public works program. The government has to come up with a solution for us. Who do you think should be responsible for the economy? We can’t afford to be complacent and just sit back and watch the economy collapse. We need to be proactive and take action to save our economy.

The first of four presidential debates featured the two candidates, Tyler and Molly. They debated de-fund the war that the Republican candidate has done whatever it can to stimulate our economy. They debated how wrong entering Iraq really was. They debated how you can’t really win a debate.

The second debate involved paid advertisements. The two candidates each spent a million dollars on ads. The first four presidential debates featured the two candidates. Tyler and Molly. They debated defund the war. The second debate involved paid advertisements. The two candidates each spent a million dollars on ads. The first four presidential debates featured the two candidates. Tyler and Molly. They debated defund the war. The second debate involved paid advertisements. The two candidates each spent a million dollars on ads. The first four presidential debates featured the two candidates. Tyler and Molly. They debated defund the war.