Student takes on role of zombie by Michelle Martin

Sitting around Friday night, senior Drew Clark waits for a call from his fellow zombie hunter asking if he wants a call from his fellow zombie hunter asking if he wants to join the humans the humans. Clark said he first played Humans vs. Zombies when he was in Truman last year.

He decided to sign up when a friend re- decided to sign up when a friend reminded him about the zombie hunt. Since then, he has remained a regular participant in the game. Clark said after the first day, seniors become more involved in the game, because they know that there are less people returning.

"I mean, 6,000 people, you know, you were probably the only 20 people, and that's kind of just, you know, you're like a ghost there," Clark said.

The next event in the game is the walk on Nov. 1.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

Clark said he first played Humans vs. Zombies when he was in Truman last year. He decided to sign up when a friend reminded him about the zombie hunt. Since then, he has remained a regular participant in the game. Clark said after the first day, seniors become more involved in the game, because they know that there are less people returning.

"I mean, 6,000 people, you know, you were probably the only 20 people, and that's kind of just, you know, you're like a ghost there," Clark said.

The next event in the game is the walk on Nov. 1.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

Clark said he first played Humans vs. Zombies when he was in Truman last year. He decided to sign up when a friend reminded him about the zombie hunt. Since then, he has remained a regular participant in the game. Clark said after the first day, seniors become more involved in the game, because they know that there are less people returning.

"I mean, 6,000 people, you know, you were probably the only 20 people, and that's kind of just, you know, you're like a ghost there," Clark said.

The next event in the game is the walk on Nov. 1.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

Clark said he first played Humans vs. Zombies when he was in Truman last year. He decided to sign up when a friend reminded him about the zombie hunt. Since then, he has remained a regular participant in the game. Clark said after the first day, seniors become more involved in the game, because they know that there are less people returning.

"I mean, 6,000 people, you know, you were probably the only 20 people, and that's kind of just, you know, you're like a ghost there," Clark said.

The next event in the game is the walk on Nov. 1.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.

"It's a time of remembrance and telling stories and just a way for us because we tend to forget in our daily lives," Tahamara Ibarra said.