Parties discuss political ideologies

BY ZOE MARTIN
Assistant Features Editor

In a little more than a month, voters will decide who gets to hang out in the White House for the next four years. Campaigning for candidates on national and local levels is costing parties millions of dollars. College Republicans and Democrats are expecting unprecedented enthusiasm from liberal voters and new voters in political campaigns. From the top of the ticket in national elections, the top of the ticket in national elections, the two political parties have found a way to make young voters feel like they’re a part of the process, willing to accept the challenge. At the White House for the next four years, voters will decide who gets to hang out in the White House for the next four years.

Jim Schisler, chair of the College Republicans, said she grew up with Democratic parents but does not agree with the Democratic party. “I can’t vote for someone who’s pro-choice, pro-abortion, pro-homosexuality,” Schisler said. “I don’t think that’s the right choice for my country.”

Lang said that in this election, young voters across the political spectrum are motivated to affect the results of this election will create a third party in the United States, a third party that will appeal to Republicans, Libertarians and Democrats. “We have a lot of folks wanting to vote, which is what I think is really interesting the change and the advancement that both candidates are offering,” Lang said.

“Government is a place where people can come together, it’s a place where we are able to address our common issues and find pragmatic solutions,” said Jimmy Long, president of College Democrats.

Lang attributes the motivation of young Democrats to Obama’s message. “He’s the young guy — I personally wasn’t a fan, I just like what he stands for,” Lang said. “I’m not going to respond to anything that offers a message of hope and a change for the better that I have a responsibility for. Lang said that in this election, young voters across the political spectrum are motivated to affect the results of this election will create a third party in the United States, a third party that will appeal to Republicans, Libertarians and Democrats. “We have a lot of folks wanting to vote, which is what I think is really interesting the change and the advancement that both candidates are offering,” Lang said.

“Government is a place where people can come together, it’s a place where we are able to address our common issues and find pragmatic solutions,” said Jimmy Long, president of College Democrats.

Lang attributes the motivation of young Democrats to Obama’s message. “He’s the young guy — I personally wasn’t a fan, I just like what he stands for,” Lang said. “I’m not going to respond to anything that offers a message of hope and a change for the better that I have a responsibility for. Lang said that in this election, young voters across the political spectrum are motivated to affect the results of this election will create a third party in the United States, a third party that will appeal to Republicans, Libertarians and Democrats. “We have a lot of folks wanting to vote, which is what I think is really interesting the change and the advancement that both candidates are offering,” Lang said. "I think the demographics of this election will create a third party in the United States, a third party that will appeal to Republicans, Libertarians and Democrats. “We have a lot of folks wanting to vote, which is what I think is really interesting the change and the advancement that both candidates are offering,” Lang said.