As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.

As journalists, we are always searching for something, whether it is a lead, a source or inspiration. We are so preoccupied with searching and waiting to return to our desks that we continually forget to put our two cents in for the most important person in the room: our readers.

The search continues this fall for Truman’s next president (see story, Page 1) who will shape the direction of one of the nation’s leading public universities.

We want a candidate who has proven experience in a Truman-like environment. We want a candidate who can connect with students, faculty and administrators as well as the Kirksville community.

It is important that the new president possesses the same characteristics and qualities that have made Truman’s previous presidents so successful.

What are the qualities of the right candidate? What are the qualities of the right president?

Our future president should also have Krueger’s and Webken’s vision and openness toward students as shown by their rewarding of the talented and creative students in Centennial Hall.

When it comes to alumni for donations, our president must be able to connect with people who care about Truman. Our president should also be able to help the University cope with the financial woes of our future.