Rerouting student Senate vision lacks focus

Brenna McDermott

There is such a thing as taking too much. Sometimes college students, especially Truman students, forget that they are just in the early stages of adulthood. As a result, we are often bombarded by professors and policymakers to learn about complex social issues. The problem is, we want to be everything to everybody. This material will provide the student body with a list of the most important issues in their own lives. This will help the student body make sense of the task at hand. That being said, we can't allow the student Senate to make decisions for the entire student population. We want to focus on one key issue. You can do that by reading the Vision document and determining the most important issues in your life. Then you can look to our student Senate and see how their initiatives will result in failure. The student Senate will have a hard time completing their vision, not because the student Senate is unqualified, but because the student Senate has too many goals.

Brenna McDermott is a junior communication major from St. Louis, Mo.