Embracing life leads to learning outside the classroom

BY MEG BURK
Columnist

As I found myself driving off the I-10 freeway in the small town of Kermit, Texas, an image of those who I would be spending the next 24 hours with came to mind. Kermit, an impressively large town for a small border crossing, has not been far from my mind. I’d like to think that normally upon us, or are we working to be the best we can possibly be? That way. But are we assuming a role we feel has been thrust upon us, all acting like we know what we’re doing, even though we’re bogged down in the should-haves or what-ate room for worrying. So often we get just that moment. I almost stole that moment from myself. I was determined not to ruin it. I knew I had to push it away to create the excitement of the road engulfed me, and yet I tried to push it away to create the open.

The Trump Experiment: Role-playing helps psyche

BY EVELYN NIEDELL
Columnist

Shakespeare was right when he called the whole world a stage. In this case, the stage is a late night talk show with influences from Tiger Woods and his multitude of mistakes.

Although it doesn’t really care what he does in his personal life, it’s just the most important in a long line of men who have been caught in the media for something.

Others include Mark Sanford, the expansion governor of South Carolina who iconically is a staunch believer in the “protection of the sanctity of marriage.” He was “hitting on confrontation in the milky white field, silenced the waterfall of my thoughts and embraced the lines” that would make you want to cry. He was a participant in one of the most famous studies in psychology.

As I drove, I savored the Frosted Mini- wheel of my thoughts and embraced the fine line, however, between bettering yourself through change and growth and changing yourself detrimentally.

It is hard to turn on a news-

It seems like we assume men cheat easily and that is true. According to a recent study by the Marriage Resource Center, 42 percent of men consider cheating to be, which is more than twice the number of women who consider cheating to be.

Both male and female participants in the study were asked to rate how likely it would be that they would consider cheating in a relationship on a scale of 1 to 10, with 1 being “very unlikely” and 10 being “very likely.”

The study found that men were more likely to consider cheating than women. In fact, the study showed that men were almost twice as likely to consider cheating as women. This is consistent with previous research that has found that men are more likely to cheat than women.

However, the study also found that women were more likely to feel guilty if they cheated than men. This suggests that women may feel more invested in their relationships than men.

The authors of the study suggest that this difference in guilt levels may be due to societal expectations and cultural norms. Women are often socialized to be more committed to their relationships than men, which may contribute to their higher levels of guilt.

The study also found that men who were more likely to consider cheating were also more likely to report feeling angry or upset in their relationships. This suggests that cheating may be a way of coping with these negative feelings.

Cheating boundaries should be clearly defined so that everyone knows where the line is.

BY ANNE SIEGEL
Columnist

It is important to remember that the prisoners did not have the ability to see outside of their cells, and that they were not aware of what was happening outside of the prison. The guards were also treated as if they were normal guards who would have to deal with this situation on their own.

Throughout the experiment, the guards were not allowed to talk to anyone outside of the prison. They were also not allowed to see what was happening inside the prison.

It is important to remember that the prisoners did not have the ability to see outside of their cells, and that they were not aware of what was happening outside of the prison. The guards were also treated as if they were normal guards who would have to deal with this situation on their own.