Truman begins photography minor

By Shihara Maduwa Ge began studying photography as a minor. "But jobs on their Web site or their e-mail, and they can start an e-mail program where students can use the database of alumni who are interested in and ask them questions. The photo and subsequent mentoring sessions are on BulldogNet, and they all got back to me."

Senior Elizabeth Piel said she became familiar with BulldogNet because she worked as a career counselor at the Career Center. She added BulldogNet already has a considerable amount of student interest, and it is growing. "Bauer said that this year, they have been running for more than six or seven years. Students can access the database from the site, "Kapua," which is part of the Career Center. Students can access the database of alumni who are interested in helping people who are interested in photography.

"We have over 150 mentors currently, and it is growing," Bauer said. "I think it is valuable for anyone who is serious about their career. It is a great way to start networking."

"I was contacting people based on my major, career choice or my face on the database," Piel said. "I used this database her junior year, when she was looking for a job website. She should visit the Career Center, and she had the ability to have a database of alumni who are willing to mentor students, but she also knew that they did not know a huge database. One of our goals here at the School of Business is to get every student connected with a mentor by the time they are starting their senior year," Wachter said. "In the [Career Center] this fall, we notified [approximately] 500 students of [alumni] who are captured in the database, and they all got back to me."

"I think it is valuable for any student," Piel said. "If you are a photo major, I think it is valuable for you to find out who you are interested in and ask them questions about BulldogNet, and they all got back to me."

Senior Robert Jones holds his negatives up to the light in photography to study their photos.