Representative talks budget

McClanahan explains appropriations process

By Shihara Maduwage

Staff Reporter

The budget appropriations process has begun, and each budget has been put to the make clear State Rep. Rebecca McClanahan D-Kirksville, is working to represent the Truman State University faculty and the Missouri Department of Corrections for Mo). The Missouri House of Representatives has divided into six committees and has begun formulating their own budget proposals.

McClanahan said the appropriations process needed to be met by the Missouri Senate before this year. She had never had a chance to participate in the appropriations process in the past. McClanahan said the Missouri legislature has to think differently from the national government because it must maintain a balanced budget. She said the Missouri government will always be making choices to determine what cuts could be made while still providing services to the public.

McClanahan’s endorsements

By Blaine James

Staff Reporter

Truman revises policy for using room and board aid stipend off-campus

By Elizabeth Koch

Staff Reporter

Truman senior Adam Conway, a recipient of the Truman Scholarship, said the change in policy would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

Morin said the change of practice would only affect a small number of students possible. “This is just one thing among many things,” Morin said. “This is just one way to redirect the University’s resources more efficiently.”

By Shihara Maduwage

Staff Reporter

Truman’s scholarship money will only apply toward tuition and on-campus room and board expenses beginning Fall 2011. Scholarship recipients who move off-campus would no longer be able to apply left over scholarship money to most plans of off-campus housing. "This practice has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.

Regina Morin, associate vice president for enrollment management, said this was more of a change of practice than a change of policy. "This [practice] has been happening for several years, when students left the halls of residence," Morin said. "It is a way for people who have hall tuition and room and board costs to move off campus if they wanted to so we could free up the space on campus." She said the situation has changed since the last budget was passed. "But we did not change the practice because the budget [and the University] state funding was fairly stable," Morin said.