Talking About Our Generation:
Youth needs to participate in political activism

BY ANNA MEIER Colunist

Music streams from Flac files directly to your iPhone or iPod Touch on a computer, and these streams are received and are available for the same actions we do, and some of them are even better. And the secrecy of the BYP is in full swing.

The End of Afghanistan: The Warren Report and Beyond

The war in Afghanistan was officially declared over by George Bush eight years ago in November 2001, but the US forces have never left the country. In fact, about 10,000 US troops were still stationed in Afghanistan as of December 2019, and it is unclear when or if they will be fully withdrawn.

Many have noticed the confusion and uncertainty surrounding the end of the US military presence in Afghanistan. When I graduated from high school, the idea of being in the military was something I dreamed of. I was one of the few in my class who considered joining the military, but after some research and discussion with my mentors, I decided against it.

At the time, I thought it was important to serve my country, but as I learned more about the realities of military service, I realized that it was not the path for me. I was concerned about the impact it would have on my personal and academic goals. I didn't want to sacrifice my education or social life for the sake of serving in the military.

Instead, I decided to pursue a career in a field that would allow me to contribute to society in a meaningful way. I chose to study political science, with a focus on international relations, and I hope to one day work for a nonprofit or advocacy organization that promotes peace and social justice.

I believe that youth can make a difference in the world, and I am inspired by the countless examples of young people who have fought for social change. It is crucial for us to engage in political activism and to use our voices to advocate for the issues that matter to us.

As we move into the future, I hope that we can continue to work together to create a better world for all of us. Let's make a difference today and every day.