By Jennifer Lewis

Six days before the massive earthquake rocked the country of Haiti, Professor of History Marc Becker was there. In one corner of the poorest nation, outside of the two universities with which he is affiliated, Marc Becker’s story was about to destroy everything he had known.

Marc Becker was there. He saw the conditions that had led to Haiti’s present state. He had lived in the country for six years before disaster struck to help those in need.

I’m never quite sure how to talk about these experiences because now I see them through the lens of the earthquake,” Becker said. Professor of History

Marc Becker was there. He saw the conditions that had led to Haiti’s present state. He had lived in the country for six years before disaster struck to help those in need.

Marc Becker was there. He saw the conditions that had led to Haiti’s present state. He had lived in the country for six years before disaster struck to help those in need.

Marc Becker was there. He saw the conditions that had led to Haiti’s present state. He had lived in the country for six years before disaster struck to help those in need.

Marc Becker was there. He saw the conditions that had led to Haiti’s present state. He had lived in the country for six years before disaster struck to help those in need.