“Invictus” tells heroic sports tale

BY KEN DUGILLO

“I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul.”

A 19th century poem by English poet William E. Henley’s “Invictus.” Henley, an American who was born partially deaf and had his right leg amputated below the knee, wrote “Invictus” in 1875 while in a hospital recovering from a surgery to remove a tumor from his spine. The 1875 poem, “Invictus,” is the final words of the 1875 poem, “Invictus.” Henley wrote, “I am the captain of my soul.”

The opening line of Nelson Mandela’s book, “Long Walk to Freedom,” begins with the words, “I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul.”

The book’s opening line tells the story of Mandela’s life, from his childhood in the Transvaal to his presidency of South Africa. It is a story of perseverance and the power of the human spirit.

The book’s opening line is a reminder that everyone has the power to control their own lives and make the best of any situation. It is a reminder that even in the face of adversity, one can still achieve great things.

The book’s opening line is a call to action, a reminder that we all have the power to shape our own destinies. It is a reminder that we can all be masters of our fate and captains of our souls.

The book’s opening line is a testament to the power of hope and the importance of never giving up. It is a reminder that even in the darkest of times, there is always a glimmer of light that can help us find our way. It is a reminder that we can all be heroes.

The book’s opening line is a call to action, a reminder that we all have the power to shape our own destinies. It is a reminder that we can all be masters of our fate and captains of our souls. It is a reminder that we can all be heroes.

The book’s opening line is a testament to the power of hope and the importance of never giving up. It is a reminder that even in the darkest of times, there is always a glimmer of light that can help us find our way. It is a reminder that we can all be heroes.