Students show spirit with action, not apparel

John Hitzel

Tyler Rutherford

School spirit is one of those terms used frequently but not with the same meaning in every context. It_a term that has been used in various ways. As a student, I have observed that school spirit is most often associated with the actions of students, rather than the apparel they wear. For example, some students choose to wear school colors once a week as a way to show their support for their school. However, other students choose not to wear school colors, but instead engage in activities that express their school spirit.

I believe that school spirit is best demonstrated through actions, rather than through the wearing of school colors. While it is important to express support for one's school, the focus should be on actions that are meaningful and significant. Wearing school colors may be a symbol of support, but it is not necessarily an effective way to demonstrate school spirit.

I have observed that students who actively engage in school-related activities are more likely to have a sense of belonging and pride in their school. For example, students who participate in school sports, clubs, or community service are more likely to feel a sense of belonging and pride in their school. These students are more likely to have a positive view of their school and are more likely to become engaged in their school community.

Therefore, I argue that school spirit should be demonstrated through actions, rather than through the wearing of school colors. While wearing school colors may be a symbol of support, it is important to focus on actions that are meaningful and significant. By engaging in activities that express our school spirit, we can demonstrate our support for our school in a way that is meaningful and significant.