"Bounty" fails to create laughs

Review

Despite a strong premise, "Bounty" comes along as an average film. Its humor is not strong enough to make the audience laugh, and the acting is mediocre. The story is predictable, and the pacing is slow.

Jennifer Aniston and Gerard Butler star in "The Bounty Hunter," which does not do much to sink the audience into the tale of a bounty hunter and his ex-wife.

"Bounty" de- serves its rating of "PG-13" as foul language is present throughout the film. Aniston and Gerard Butler had a great chemistry on and off the set, but their chemistry didn't translate into the film.

However, when the two actors are on screen together, they make a believable couple. Aniston's character, Nicole, is typecast as the sexy, hard-ass bad girl. She is not a one-dimensional character, though, and she is more than just a pretty face. Her character's development is slow, but it is there. The chemistry between her and Butler's character, Travis, is believable, but it is not enough to carry the film alone.

Travis, played by Gerard Butler, is a bounty hunter who is trying to find his ex-wife, Nicole. The two have a history together, and Travis is determined to find her. However, when he finally does find her, he realizes that he doesn't want to be with her anymore. This is a revelation for Travis, and it makes the audience question what the film is really about.

"Bounty" is a film that is not afraid to take risks. It is a film that is not afraid to be different. It is a film that is not afraid to be honest. And it is a film that is not afraid to be funny. The film is not perfect, but it is a film that is worth watching. And it is a film that is worth talking about.
