Festival returns music to art form

Church should hold priests accountable

Aless Boles

Spokes, open-water, open

Share this story on Facebook

A Risk

Interviewing priests, especially those who have been in the church for a long time, can be a dangerous proposition, but an important one. The church is an institution that hides its faults, but it is also an institution that is responsible for so much good. It is the church that teaches us to love and forgive, that teaches us to be kind and compassionate. It is the church that provides us with a sense of community and belonging. Without the church, many of us would be lost.

There are a few things that the church should be held accountable for. First, the church should be held accountable for its failures. The church has a history of abuse and neglect, and it is time that the church is held accountable for these failures. Second, the church should be held accountable for its doctrine. The church has a history of teaching things that are not true, and it is time that the church is held accountable for these teachings.

The church should also be held accountable for its leadership. The church has a history of placing people in positions of power who are not qualified for the job, and it is time that the church is held accountable for these appointments.

The church should also be held accountable for its finances. The church has a history of mismanaging its funds, and it is time that the church is held accountable for these mismanagement.

The church should also be held accountable for its policies. The church has a history of making policies that are not in the best interest of its members, and it is time that the church is held accountable for these policies.

The church should also be held accountable for its silence. The church has a history of not speaking out against injustice, and it is time that the church is held accountable for this silence.

The church, as an institution, should be held accountable for all of these things. It is time that the church is held accountable for its failures, doctrine, leadership, finances, policies, and silence. It is time that the church is held accountable for all of these things.