Newman Center moves into new facility
1990

The Catholic student center serving Truman State University's Catholic population was relocated to 709 S. Davis St. The new facility met the Catholic community's need for more space. Funding for the facility was provided by Catholic churches throughout Missouri, as well as parents and alumni. "I see that our role as campus ministry is to make our services as meaningful and beneficial as possible," said Rev. Kevin Clohessy, then Newman Center director.

Faculty Senate approves nondiscrimination policy amendment
1993

Faculty Senate approved a proposal to add sexual orientation to the University's nondiscrimination policy. The addition came just two months after the Board of Governors officially added religion to the same policy. "To neglect sexual orientation, two words, is to suggest that we must remain silent against ignorance and fear — two things I think the University should be trying to correct," then assistant professor John Schmor said.

University becomes a member of MOBIUS
2001

Pickler Memorial Library joined MOBIUS, an association that forms a single library and catalog system comprising 53 academic libraries in Missouri. The system allows students to access resources from any of the 53 member libraries by request via the Internet. "In the past, I had to get material from a different library, and I had to go through somebody else," said then senior Megan Hevel.

Senate passes student activity fee proposal
1993

Student Senate approved a proposal for a student activity fee, which increased tuition by $10 a semester. "We need to start the year with a relatively high agency account so we have something to fall back on," said Tracy Wolff, then Student Activities Board treasurer. Because of the fee, all future SAB-sponsored events became free to the University community. The current fee is $50 a semester for students.

Students debate proposed multi-use field behind Centennial Hall
1997

A proposed multi-use field to be constructed behind Centennial Hall became a topic of debate among students when first suggested by University planners. Some of the students were concerned about the potential loss of 74 parking spaces located on the proposed site. The expected $300,000 cost came from a surplus in the Student Recreation Center budget. Despite concerns, the Board of Governors approved the plan — though not until January 1998.

Environmental studies minor offered
2004

Following approval by Student Senate, Faculty Senate and the Undergraduate Council, the Environmental studies minor was made an option for students. The new minor introduced an unfamiliar class experience for students as two professors from two disciplines were pegged to teach the introductory course to environmental studies. "This should heighten interest — seeing the interplay between two different approaches," associate accounting professor James Turner said.
