Q & A

Theatre
Professor David
Charles Goyette

Theatre professor David Charles Goyette joined three colleagues this fall for the production of a faculty-acted show, "God of Carnage," in what became an educational opportunity for the professors and the students. Theatre professor Ron Rybkowski directed the show, with theatre professors Randy Bame and Dana Smith acting alongside Goyette. "God of Carnage" featured two sets of parents clashing while trying to have a polite conversation regarding a disagreement between their sons.

When was the last time you acted on stage?

"[I acted in] Truman's production of 'Art,' three years ago."

What was the rehearsal process like for this show?

"We started on a Wednesday and then basically did seven days of rehearsal."

How did this process compare to a typical rehearsal process?

"There was less tech in this show, because we otherwise usually try to provide a lot of technical opportunities."

What did you do personally as an actor to prepare for the role outside of rehearsals?

"I try to always be warmed up, so I do a whole bunch of vocal exercises and I do my little bits of yoga and I do a couple pushups."

Are these preparation methods things that you teach your students as well?

"I think all [of the theatre professors] are doing things that we teach our students. We're especially making choices to model the things that we're talking about."
