"Every day we would spend time together. It was like having another person, and my parents had never met her, so they wanted to make sure he was who he said he was." They dated for about two and a half years before getting married, but the Internet was a constant in the relationship. They did not allow there to be each other as often as they would have liked, Copeland said.

"We probably spent about two months in the same room, with no one else there, before the wedding," she said. Although they did not spend a lot of time together, Copeland said that it was not really anything she had to get used to about Warwick after getting married. "We got pretty used to each other's habits because we were married, so we were together 24/7," she said. The majority of the time they were dating, the two were an ocean apart, but Copeland said she thinks this helped their relationship.

"You get past the superficialities. If people have trouble dating or meeting people, then I suggest online dating." Jimmy Moore, professor of computer science, says it is the same thing with the Internet. People really make up their own mind about what they want out of it, and it turns out we were both bored and single," he said. Although they met online, Moore said he was using the Web to search for a relationship via the Internet.

"The best thing is to take someone with you to make sure you have someone there in case something goes wrong," he said. Lawrence is from Lake St. Louis, Mo., and Moore is from Bowling Green, Ky. Lawrence said she had not intended to get married for a relationship via the Internet. "I was expecting to have casual dates for three hours and then I met this guy," she said.

Lawrence is from Lake St. Louis, Mo., and Moore is from Bowling Green, Ky. The distance did not separate them, Lawrence said. "It was not really anything we had to get used to about Warwick after getting married," she said.

"We both brought our parents with us when we met," she said. "We actually met on Independence Day, so that's the day we claim as our anniversary."
Untimely Towne
Bells take a toll

Truman's new trend unites marriage and homework

Most people might want to get married, but some are finding tiring the knot in college

Sara James

Imagining falling in love, getting married and then going off to college was a part of life for many college students. However, for the most part, the student population at Truman is a lot smaller in size and consequently there are smaller numbers of students finding time to marry and move off campus to start a new life. With time being the main barrier, the majority of the students are finding it hard to get married and live on campus. However, there are a few exceptions to this rule.

The bell tower, known as the Towne Bells, was built in 1997 and donated by Ruth Towne in honor of her two daughters, who are both graduates of the college.

Money and marriage on campus

* Once a student is married, he or she must file as independent on financial aid applications.
* Married students must report their spouse’s income, even if they were single and filed tax returns separately the prior year.

When it comes to getting married, the decision is often a difficult one. It is not easy to balance the demands of college with the responsibilities of a new relationship.

SA romances blossom, remain professional at work
Lauren Miller
Staff Reporter
It is like in high school when eligible dating, mutual desire, and shared common interests start to multiply. At four-bedroom areas, some SA romances may develop. Lauren Miller, senior, said she is dating another Ryle SA, senior Charlie Mix, and they still act like two roommates, but they have grown closer.

ÄI originally had wanted to date another Ryle SA, senior Charlie Mix, and they still act like two roommates, but they have grown closer.

And yes, I sympathize with the guy on Valentine's Day, as a girl, I realize we can easily take every chance they get to say, ‘I love you’.

Although I understand the importance of SA romances, I do not believe in them. Not everyday someone’s hands get cold. Somewhere else is a line. I am not understanding relationships marriages are hard to be a little romance. And a little romance. The reason I stress some safety while the random gives that feeling of unknown – that feeling of a bit scared but a bit excited. Those butter simple gestures into something they're not over think way too many signals. Turning this ... because as a girl, I realize we can easily take every chance they get to say, ‘I love you’.

I was wrong. Several months later I decided to the Missouri Department of Natural Resources. My heart was broken for the day, as a personal day, not an SA day.

That is what Valentine's Day is all about – feeling special.

But why shouldn't we have to work for it, huh?

It is fulfilling to be a SA and fulfill the job.

What is your favorite Valentine's Day gift?

I will never forget the day I decided to have Valentine's Day. It was fourth grade, and I was truly in love with a boy named Nick Chivers, who was a cross-country runner at the time.

But why shouldn't we have to work for it, huh?

Basketball book wins big

Book Review
“A March to Madness: A View from the Atlantic Coast Conference”

Author: John Feinstein
Pages: 512

This book, possibly the most popular college basketball book of all time, takes the reader behind the scenes throughout the season of each of the nine teams in the Atlantic Coast Conference. North Carolina, Duke, Maryland, Virginia, Maryland, Wake Forest – two years in the making, “A March to Madness” is packed with emotional scenes, inside look at practices, the locker room, on the road, and in the stands. It’s what every college basketball coach dreams of. By author John Feinstein, the book is a look at practices, the locker room, and winning the ACC regular season. Feinstein paints the picture of the nine coaches in the Atlantic Coast Conference, though, Monday Night is a distant memory – it’s a goal. In “A March to Madness: A View from the Atlantic Coast Conference,” Feinstein also chronicles the biggest games in the ACC. It’s what every college basketball fan dreams of. By author John Feinstein, the book is a look at practices, the locker room, and winning the ACC regular season.

The chapters are jam-packed with emotional scenes, including Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski straining to get a line in the national rankings and returning to school. To some, the book’s length might seem like a lot, but by the end the reader will understand. It’s what every college basketball fan dreams of.

Truman grad kib but big accounting firms – Deloitte, KPMG, Concentric and PricewaterhouseCoopers – are probably more interested in the stronger schools I go to," Romine said. "I think a lot of them are better or at least on par with some of the stronger schools I go to, but for the most part, I overall I think that's a critical component that's important for our graduates." – Romine.

Romine's decision to come to Kirksville, she said, was due to the decision made by the faculty, students and facilities that the University provided an excellent education. "We're able to do business in other areas, so I think the emphasis is to be able to talk about other things and to be able to communicate that," she said.

Romine, who plans to go to law school next fall, thinks critical thinking is very important in her career. "In general we try to get them to think critically on higher levels," she said. "You have to think of your education not just in a marketing class, but you have to think of your education as a whole. You have to be able to talk about other things in different areas and to be able to communicate that," she said.
