Date rape incident prompts awareness

Conference on sex-related concerns draws interest

Professor cautions that Truman students are not immune to date rape

Last fall, a Student Senate meeting saw the glued down a date rape drug, and just as quickly contracted cotton balls from her pockets.

We never reported the crime. Actually, many students, in fact, have reported none, because, as far as we know, we have heard of this incident in confidence, and more than one has been warning women that this man is still at large. Even worse, we were a little naive to the idea that the man might be a serial rapist.

A registered nurse at the emergency room of Northwest Regional Medical Center confirmed even: evidence is collected by using rape kits and includes samples of hair, clothing, blood and semen. Of the hospital’s 200 beds, 16 are designated as rape victims, and about 25 percent of the patients are referred to their victim support services.

In the case of a sexual assault, it is critical that the victim not be forced to collect evidence. Instead, the police will take the items and the victim will be transported to the hospital for the collection of evidence.

If someone reports a rape to the police, called Victim Support Services, and the victim is encouraged to go to the emergency room for testing. If a rape occurs, the police call Victim Support Services, and the victim reports a rape, the police call Victim Support Services.

The police investigate the crime, LeBaron said. “They have a very professional way of helping with crime, and they have excellent victim support services.”

“A rape doesn’t rape one time. They rape until they’re caught,” said LeBaron.

Victim Support Services is a place where people can find help and support in dealing with the aftermath of a sexual assault. They provide counseling, advocacy, and legal support.

It is important to report sexual assault to the police, even if you are not sure if it was a sexual assault. Reporting can help prevent future assaults and bring the person responsible to justice.
