The society preserves a variety of artifacts related to the history of the county. Ellebracht said the museum collection consists entirely of items from individuals and groups with ties to the community.

"We try to keep those items that have some historical significance. If the item is valuable, if it's very popular, local and community related, we keep it," Ellebracht said.

The collection contains a variety of artifacts, such as personal letters, old clothing, old tools and machinery, clothing, artwork and items from farm businesses. The society does not accept items without ties to the community.

"We do have to do some cleaning and dehumidifying of the artifacts of the process of conserving and preserving them," Ellebracht said.

Ellebracht said one of the more recent Chautauqua events contributed the population of stuff, such as windmills from the community. The society donated a couple of old windmills, about six or seven, and is planning to showcase them at the library. They are asking community members to come in and help them with the assembly of the display.

Ellebracht said the society has been involved in the planning and setup of the last two Chautauqua events. The group donated $1,500 in support of the 2003 Chautauqua and set up the Post Office exhibit with the help of the Post Office and City Hall.

Advertisers and donations, the society can make limited improvements.

Kigar said that with more money the society could expand from 250 to possibly 500 visitors per week. "We want to encourage students to make the building handicapped accessible and establish a greater presence on the Internet for people from outside areas."

"I think they do an amazing job of keeping it dynamic," Ellebracht said of the society.

Ellebracht said the society also provides information about high school students who are doing family histories, among other sources, he said. "We want every kind of information presented that is good for the community," Ellebracht said. "We want to encourage students to do their family histories."

Ellebracht said the society gets about 30 to 40 visitors per week. "It's very important for a place to have a sense of its history. We're probably doing a good job," he said.

"I think they do an amazing job," Ellebracht said of the society.

"We want the whole community to feel involved in the museum," Ellebracht said. He said the society gets about 50 to 60 responses for family research each year. "It's very important for a place to have a sense of its history," Ellebracht said.
