University's coolest college ranking is absurd

Ann Heffron

In 1996 Northeast Missouri State University was included in the University's "coolest college" ranking. In 1994 Truman joined The Council of Public Liberal Arts Colleges, an organization of 27 public liberal arts colleges that was created as a way to "counteract the alleged decline of the liberal arts" and "demonstrate a commitment to the liberal arts and sciences education." According to Truman's Web site, the University's "goal is to produce a high-quality liberal arts education emphasizing: studies of humanity, science, social justice, ethical and pedagogical prudence. In addition to these academic missions, the University is trying to improve Truman's image. To that end, the University has attempted to improve its ranking and attract new students. The ranking system is used to evaluate the quality of educational programs at liberal arts colleges, and it is often used as a measure of a school's prestige and reputation. However, it is important to note that these rankings are subjective and do not necessarily reflect the actual quality of the education provided at a particular school. It is also important to consider other factors, such as the cost of tuition, the availability of financial aid, and the availability of internships and other practical experiences, when evaluating the quality of an education. Truman has attempted to improve its ranking in part by highlighting the quality of its liberal arts education and the success of its graduates. However, it is important to note that rankings are not the only measure of the quality of an education, and it is important to consider other factors, such as the satisfaction of students and the quality of their experiences, when evaluating the quality of an education.
