Funds top list for future VP

Thursday, April 1, 2004

Speaker discusses communicating the sexes

by Penny Koester

It’s not what you say, it’s how you say it.

Speaker Susan Carnahan similarly delivered the old maxim in her presentation today when she spoke on communicating between the sexes.

"It’s not what you say, it’s how you say it," Carnahan said.

"I think my role was to help students see how to communicate and then provide a forum for all the students to talk about their role in the communication process," she said.

Carnahan said women and men communicate differently, which is the basis of this presentation. She said it is important for both genders to communicate in various ways and to realize their significant differences when communicating with one another.

"In the beginning of the presentation, the students were not even aware that there were differences," Carnahan said.

"I definitely think that the way the presentation was put together makes people more comfortable because they hear from the pertinent information," Carnahan said.

"I think the most beneficial part was that we related to almost everything she said."