Online courses give students a summer option

Faculty, students eager for summer online courses

"Students can earn Truman credit from the comfort of their own homes this summer," said Arthur Davis, associate professor of English, who will teach two online courses available for students to complete from their own homes this summer.

"This year we are offering students the opportunity to earn one of two six-week online courses that are equivalent to classes they might be taking on campus," said Davis.

"The world of higher learning is changing and more and more students are choosing to take online classes," Davis said. "I think we are finding that online education is becoming a viable alternative to traditional methods of instruction.

"I think the biggest benefit to students is the flexibility that online education provides," said Davis. "Students can work on their coursework at their own convenience, and they don't have to be on campus for the entire semester.

"Online education is becoming more popular because it allows students to earn credit online, and it also provides them with the opportunity to complete coursework at their own pace," said Davis.

"I think that particularly students who can't attend classes on campus will benefit from online courses," said Davis.

"Although the course schedule may not be as expansive as the one on campus, online courses offer a variety of options for students to choose from," said Davis.

"I think that students who are interested in taking online classes should definitely look into the options available at Truman," said Davis.

"I think that online education is a great way for students to earn credit and complete coursework at their own convenience, and I think that Truman's online courses offer a lot of options for students to choose from," said Davis.

"I think that online education is becoming more popular because it allows students to earn credit online, and it also provides them with the opportunity to complete coursework at their own pace," said Davis.

"I think that online education is a great way for students to earn credit and complete coursework at their own convenience, and I think that Truman's online courses offer a lot of options for students to choose from," said Davis.