I had lost everything," Ross said. "I had no notes, nothing."

"I really hoped whoever had it, had taken it by accident," Ross said. "But I was really upset, the first 24 hours that someone could have done this." The bookbag contained two textbooks, a planner, graphing calculator, and other essential items. Ross stored the bookbag in the Truman Bookstore. Using the information supplied by the bookstore, Public Safety soon contacted her saying that someone had sold a bookbag with a textbook back to the Truman Bookstore in the Student Virtual Bookstore.

"It basically confirmed what the bookbag was not where she had left it," Ross said. "I just realized how much that meant because I had everything." When she reported her missing bookbag to the Department of Student Life, she told them her college book had a special characteristic: "One of the books I had spilled chocolate all over one ever since." Ross said. "I was really upset, and for saying that someone held a sold book with a chocolate stain back to the Truman Bookstore in the Student Virtual Bookstore.

"I had no idea who had it, but I was really upset," Ross said. The case was turned over to the county. "I think one positive thing is that we have a very well-trained police force, and the way they are working, they do a fantastic job," Ross said. "If they were working for a month, they could find a number of individuals who have.

Ross said many of the bookcases in the cafeteria have been broken or stolen, and her main problem is at the library, where [students] leave their belongings.

"I just walked around lost for a couple of days because I had everything," Ross said. "I had no idea what to do."
