Becker is ‘dangerous’, but Horowitz isn’t wrong

Mark Becker, associate professor of history, has been called as an author of David Horowitz’s new book “The Professors” as far as the willingness of professors at Truman to introduce political beliefs in the classroom. Horowitz has been lambasted by those who feel that the book is an attempt at an ideological spectrum, these views certainly mount evidence of attempts to place his book in a broader context. Although on his Web site Becker admits to political views in the classroom con

Letters to the Editor

How do you agree with the proposal that could lead to an increase in Missouri’s sales tax?

If issues don’t perturb their area of expertise, should professors express their political views in class?

Pep band should not be forced to perform at basketball games

This letter is in response to the Thomas’ column about the lack of pep band enthusiasm. The pep band is given a role in our school that is absolutely crucial. They are the backbone of our Mustang Nation. To remove them from basketball games would be a terrible mistake. They are there to provide that...
