Welfare proposal is flawed

Some elementary school students might spend their time thinking of new- comers to stay home (and their school), but if HB 959 (proposed by Missouri Rep. Mary Cookson D-153), is passed, thousands of welfare recipients could be seeing more time in jail.

The text is a part of a larger debate on welfare reform. It suggests that the proposed bill, HB 959, is flawed because it is too long, too short, and leaves too much out. It also criticizes the Missouri House of Representatives for not properly handling the bill.

The text mentions that the bill, proposed by Rep. Steve Cookson D-153, is long and is not on the House schedule, which might cause problems for the bill's passage. The text also notes that the bill would make several changes to the criminal justice system, including changing definitions to become more fair and equitable.

The text argues that the welfare proposal is flawed because it does not adequately address the root causes of criminal behavior. It suggests that the bill is a Band-Aid for the larger problem of academic apathy among young children.

The text concludes by suggesting that the bill might be a poorly thought-out piece of legislation and that it is important to consider how the bill will affect the families who are impacted by it. It also suggests that the bill might be a good idea, but it is not well thought out and needs to be updated to address the root causes of criminal behavior.

Welfare reform is an important issue, and it is important to ensure that any legislation proposed to address it is well thought out and addresses the root causes of criminal behavior. The proposed bill, HB 959, is flawed because it does not adequately address these issues, and it is important to consider how the bill will affect the families who are impacted by it.
